To study the prognosis of acute kidney injury (AKI) and other complications of hospital admission in patients admitted to an emergency department (ED). Patients were prospectively enrolled in a multicenter study of AKI and its association with mortality and the major complications of hospitalization. Clinical and biological data were collected prospectively. Of the 2,690 patients enrolled, 74% were men, with a median age of 75 years. Among these, 136 (5.2%) developed AKI and 16.5% died during hospitalization. In multivariate analysis, age and ED serum creatinine (SCr) were identified as independent risk factors for in-hospital mortality. Multivariate analysis also identified higher SCr values, lower pH, and worse estimated glomerular filtration rate (eGFR) at admission, as independent risk factors for the development of AKI. These patients were also more likely to have complications of hospitalization, mainly acute respiratory failure and infection. The in-hospital mortality and the occurrence of complications were higher in patients with AKI than in those without AKI, even after adjusting for the severity of illness using eGFR at admission. In an ED, AKI is associated with a poor prognosis in patients admitted. Factors such as SCr and eGFR at admission, which are easily available, may be useful in identifying the patients at risk.Q: Why the sentence is "Bead of Conflated Supergene" instead of "mixture of Supergene and a regular element" I found this term in my English textbook. I know the term is "Bead of Conflated Supergene". But, I can't understand the reason why it is written like this way. A: It's the outcome of a controlled experiment.
