They are a specific symptom which may be part of a disease like degenerative diseases of the nervous system. Polysomnographic sleep research revealed that sleep disturbances in old age are related to the physiological process of aging. Decreased numbers of REM sleep episodes (in the course of REM sleep), elevated NREM sleep latencies and the occurrence of parasomnias indicate a disturbed sleep architecture. The occurrence of sleep disturbances is influenced by a number of variables such as the underlying disease, the level of physical and mental impairment, social situations, self-perception, personality traits and psychological and emotional problems. Sleep disturbances such as insomnia, sleepiness, sleep apnea, nocturnal delirium or sleepwalking are associated with serious disorders like depressive states or degenerative diseases of the nervous system. The knowledge of the natural course of the aging process and the knowledge of the occurrence of sleep disturbances in old age led to the development of drugs for the treatment of sleep disorders in old age. Drugs with sedative, hypnotic and anticonvulsive effects in accordance with the sleep profile of the aged patient are administered. The present article gives an overview of the current knowledge about sleep disturbances in old age. In addition to the therapeutic effects, the pharmacological aspects of drugs which are used for the treatment of sleep disorders in old age are highlighted.[Prospective randomized comparative study on the effect of methylene blue on prevention of adhesion in laparoscopic gastric surgery].
